Dreaming is an experience we all live, which we recall, once awake, of varying degrees. Yet, dreams remain subjective, ambiguous, fragmentary, opaque. Dreams are at once fantasised and reliable, merging sacred and profane, magic and reality. It can also be, symbolically, a manifestation of an "elsewhere" in which to believe or be wary of. The dreaming experience can also be an unconscious manifestation of desire, a reality that remains hidden and protected within us, nurtured by thoughts that are unknown to others. Such illusionary reality remains also a private space, a personal dimension, created by and for us.

Starting from these reflections about art and life, Ticca's work questions the dichotomies of the everyday, and of an imaginary permeability between dream and wakefulness. Such works eventually incline more towards the sphere of dream and the irrational, rather than the one of reality as we know it.

Starting from these reflections about art and life, Ticca's work questions the dichotomies of the everyday, and of an imaginary permeability between dream and wakefulness. Such works eventually incline more towards the sphere of dream and the irrational, rather than the one of reality as we know it.

Dream, oneirism and the unconscious are celebrated, in Ticca's work, as a dimension where we can still find a space for freedom: the possibility to be simply ourselves and, at the same time, the "other".

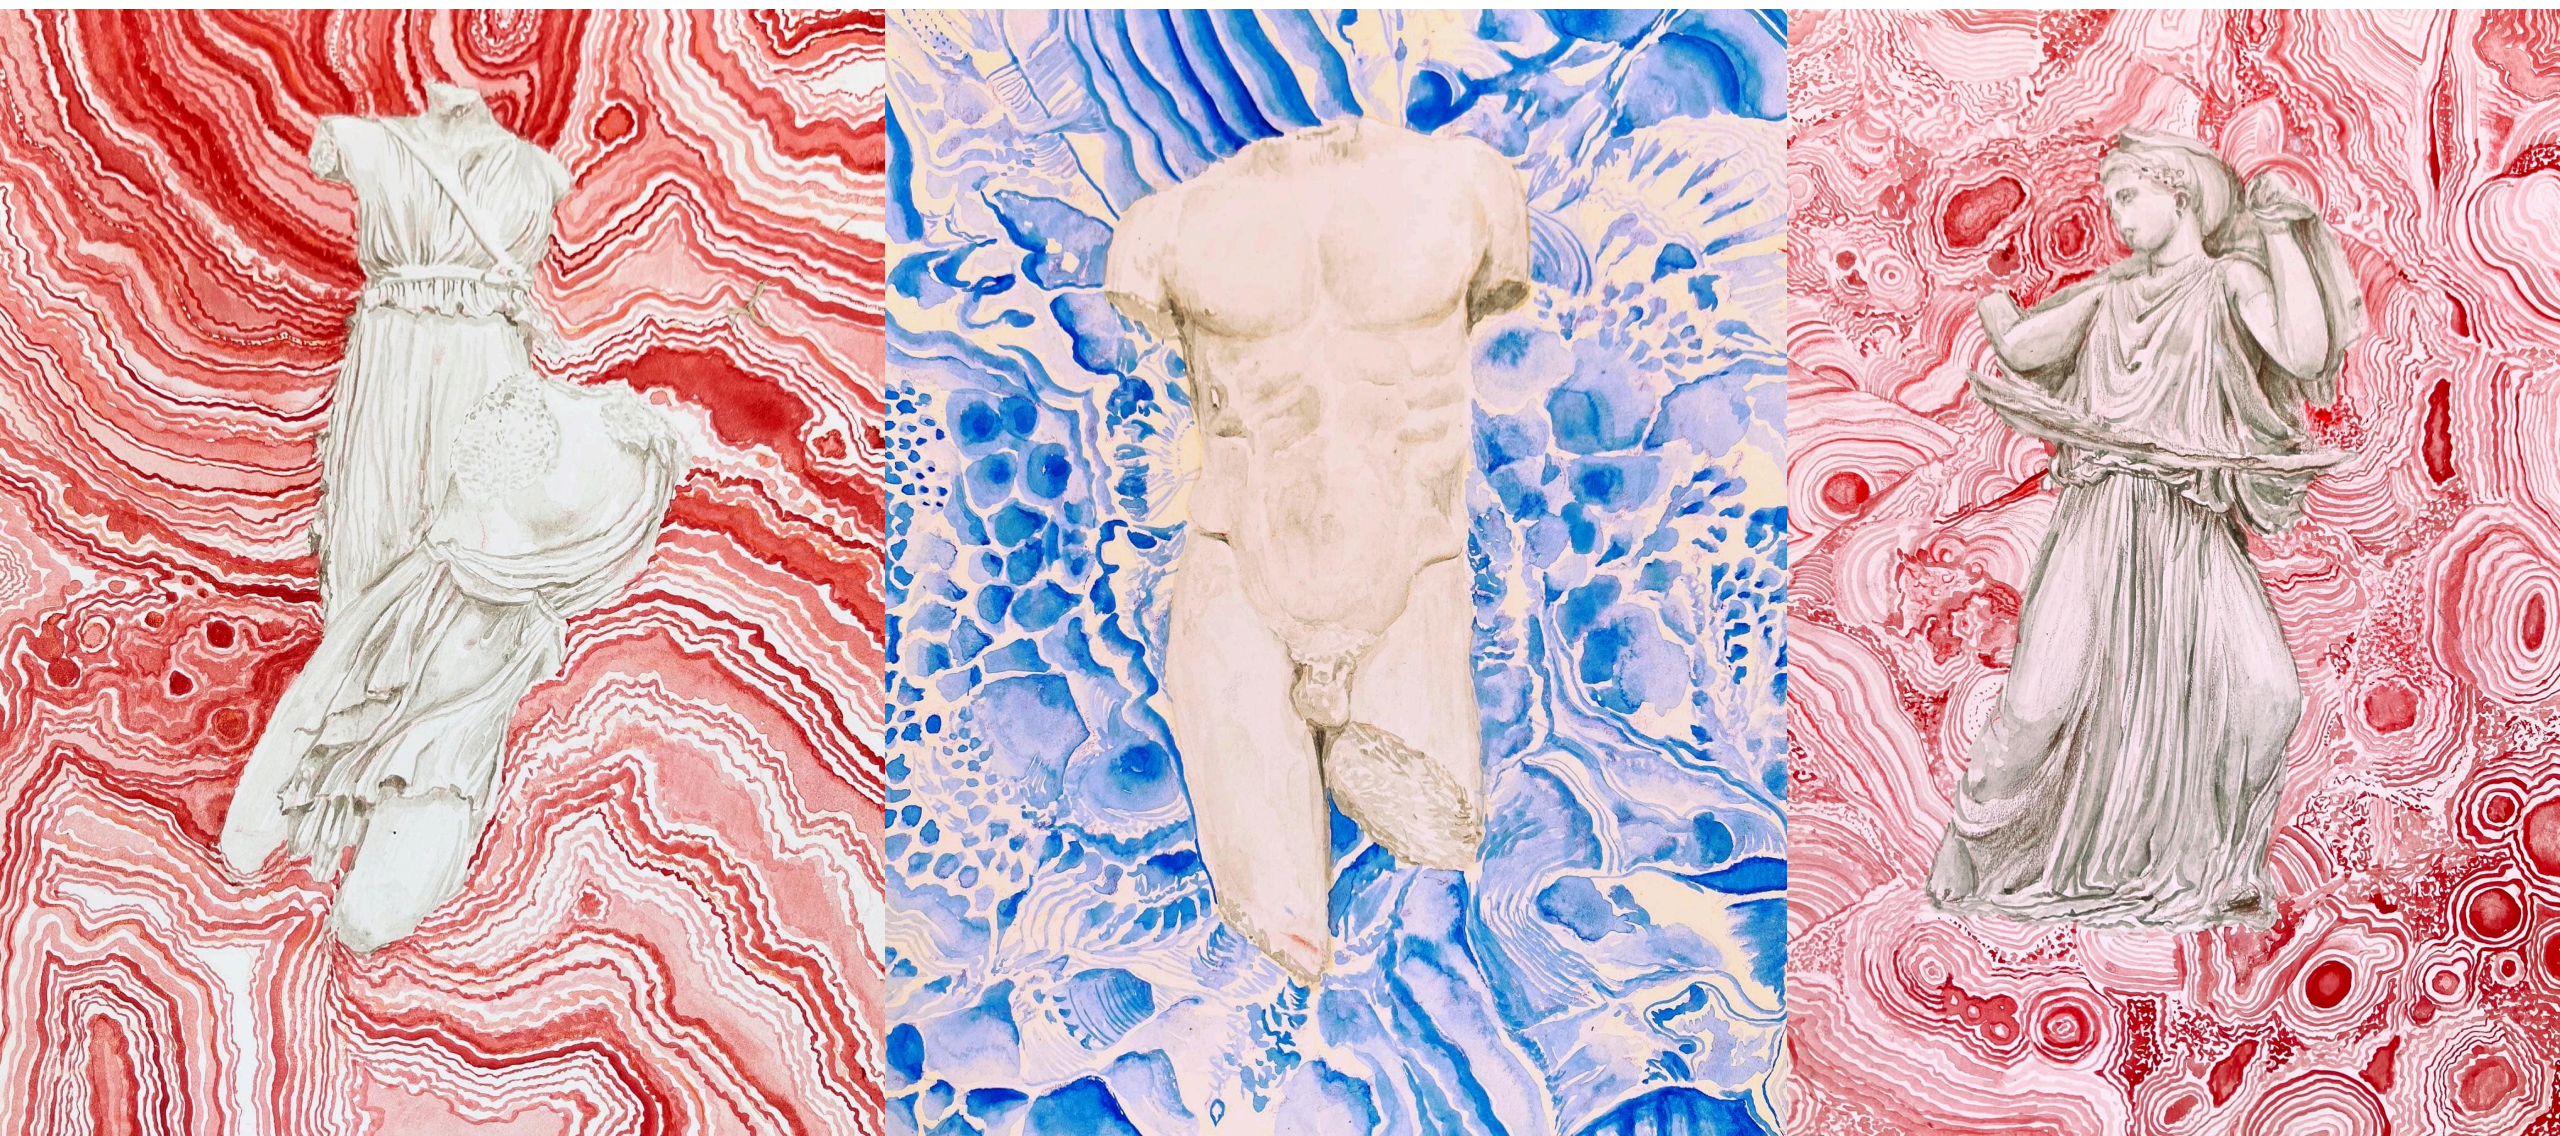

By fetishizing the ordinary, and exploring the emotional investment he attributes to his own objects, Elio Ticca digests his memories by playing with the commonplace, kitsch aesthetics, and predictable kitchen setups. Like both an investigator on a forensic scene, and a theatre director designing a performance, the artist inquires his own experiences through painting. The work, both a snapshot of life and a symbolic self-portrait, is then crystallised into a seemingly archaeological ground, where a new light has to be shed on memories and emotions, nostalgia and belonging, suffering and joyfulness, displacement and rootedness.

ABOUT

Elio Ticca (Italy, 1988) is an artist who works with painting, sculpture and installation. Graduated in visual arts at IUAV University, Italy, and in art history at the University of Leeds, United Kingdom, Ticca questions the relationships between historical and contemporary artistic languages, matrix and copy, authenticity and fiction.

Through a process of camouflage and recreation, his work aims to investigate how the representation of affect can be conceptually and culturally deconstructed, as well as narrated in new plastic and visual forms.
